Dainty lattices, prim old fashioned box hedges, masses of southern smilax, and hundreds of birds in cages and houses transformed the Phi Delta Theta house into a formal garden last night for the event of its annual formal dance. The hall was decorated with a latticework and at the back two gates opened into a little inglenook which contained a fountain.

The dining room and living room were bird rooms. The walls were covered with birds and numerous cages and bird houses were suspended from the ceiling and about the walls. Box hedges surrounded each room.

The chapter room, which was used as a dining room, had the walls covered with white and apple blossoms and blue birds decorated the blue latticework which covered the ceiling. The Gene Rodemich orchestra of St. Louis furnished music during dinner and for the dancing.

Among the favors given during the evening were small gold knives engraved with the fraternity crest attached to black ribbons, and tiny newspapers "The Little Bird" containing gossip about every one present. The girls' programs were of gold silk and the boys' programs of black leather.
